Course Description:

The purpose of this course is two-fold. In the first instance the course will provide an introduction to “economic thinking” for those students who have not had an economics course. Second, the course will provide insight to economic thinking as applied to art and cultural goods. In this regard the course will be suitable for those who have had introductory courses in economics as it will highlight the difference between art and other economic goods.

We will use Ruth Towse’s cultural economics textbook as a general text for the course but will also introduce heterodox ideas from classical economics, Austrian economics, public choice economics, economic sociology and original institutional economics. Objects of analysis will include the visual and performing arts, music, design, fashion, book publishing, film, architecture and museums. We also examine on-going debates in cultural economics such as subsidized cultural institutions as economic development, the role of intellectual property rights in encouraging creativity, consumerism and conspicuous consumption, theories of value found in cultural economics, and, the political economy of the tax-exempt versus for-profit arts sectors in the USA.

The course additionally will introduce the goods typologies found in cultural economics; private goods, public goods, mixed goods, positional goods, Veblen goods, experience goods, luxury goods, and, normal and inferior goods. This will in turn help the student conceptualize the economic and social value of art and culture. There are no prerequisites for this course.

Course Textbook: Ruth Towse (2010). A Textbook of Cultural Economics. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press. (The textbook is recommended, however a copy is also on reserve in the library.)

Students are also encouraged to discuss current events in the art economy through related news sources. We will relate current events to our syllabus topics.

Course Topics: The following is the schedule for the course along with the relevant chapters from the Towse text and any supplementary materials. We will follow each topic consecutively, the time allowed to each topic will depend on class discussions around each topic. The references in parenthesis are optional for further study and will be referenced in lectures.
